Heat treatments and chlorine gas were compared with microwave-assisted hydrogen peroxide treatment (M-H(2)O(2)) to remove Clostridium perfringens spores from surfaces of sanitized stainless steel in a food production plant. M-H(2)O(2) at 20 degrees C produced the same sporicidal effect on C. perfringens on stainless steel as did 5 min of chlorine gas at 60 degrees C. At 30 degrees C, M-H(2)O(2) was more effective, inactivating spores in 24 min as compared with 15 min for chlorine gas. Surface sanitizers, such as a 50-mg/L peracetic acid solution, a 15-mg/L acetic acid solution, or a 1.1-mg/L acetic acid solution in 1,3-propanediol, achieved high log reductions of C. perfringens (>6.5). Microscopically, sporicidal action was found to begin in the granular cells. The acetic acid treatment, based on acetic acid alone, was much more effective than either of the peroxyacetic acid formulations. Both treatments were more effective against vegetative than sporulated forms of C. perfringens. At 5% relative humidity (RH), M-H(2)O(2) at 10 degrees C reduced C. perfringens spores on stainless steel from a packaged meat product to below detectable levels. At 20 degrees C, spores were inactivated from a packaged cold-smoked salmon product to below detectable levels by M-H(2)O(2) in 20 min, Five healthy lactating Holstein cows were studied daily for 72 consecutive hours. Each animal was moved in a tie stall to a feed bunk each day at 11.00 h, and milk and blood were collected. Blood samples were collected at 10.00, 11.00, 12.00, 13.00, 14.00, 15.00, 16.00, 17.00, 18.00, 19.00, 20.00, 21.00, 22.00, 23.00, and 24.00 h. Blood was collected through a jugular vein catheter from a coccygeal vein and placed in heparinized tubes. Milk was also collected each hour through an esophageal tube. Prolactin was determined in plasma by a polyclonal peroxidase-antiperoxidase method. Each data set was plotted individually to demonstrate the circadian pattern of prolactin in nonpregnant and lactating cows. Each data set was fit to a cosine curve, and the same set of peaks and troughs were superimposed on each curve. A graphical technique was used to compare the series of oscillations between lactating and nonpregnant animals. The results of the evaluation indicate that the circadian rhythm of prolactin is abolished in lactating animals. Lactation alters the circadian rhythm of prolactin so that the oscillations in plasma prolactin are superimposed on a higher baseline level.

I'm trying to set a personal environment variable to reduce the indentation of source files in my IntelliJ editor. I know that I can do that using the following: [user.dirs] file.properties.user.dir=/home/me/my-folder but this doesn't work for.xml and.js files. Is there a way to change the way IntelliJ indents files of a certain type so that I can set this personal preference, or is there a better way to accomplish this? A: You can change it in Settings | Editor | File and Code Templates | Code | Editor | File and Code Templates | XML and JavaScript Files. Basically, you specify the type of template you want to change, and the template itself consists of the name of a file containing the template and options. very competitive so don’t be surprised if they get nervous when they see you and everyone else.
