RISE, TAIGNED, ALLY WITH YOUR GRACE, DESIGN YOUR OWN NATION, AND PASS DOWN YOUR NAMEDOM. Please visit:  Disclosure  I have not received any compensation to write this post. Link to the product: The winner of this year's Kitsune Cup was Total Warhammer 40,000: Dawn of War III in its campaign, which was fittingly held on the island of Chernobyl. This year's event, though, had something different about it. The competition was divided into two categories: regular-length and three-day format. Both were very interesting, and we'll be looking at the results of the three-day format game in this article. The participants on this year's island were a mixture of Warhammer 40,000 fans, X-Com fans, and people who just wanted to play these tactical RPGs, like me. In the first round, I faced a player with the handle "Der Riese Der Arbeit" (Translation: The giant of labor), who lost to me after a very intense and long-lasting battle. In the second round, I fought against "Mégalopolissienne", a player who some of you might remember from last year's Season 4 Finals -- a player that always treated the game as if it were a fighting game, and used elaborate tactics to do so. He lost to me just as well as last year. In the third and final round, I had another rematch with "Mégalopolissienne". This time, I'd gotten hold of his account name, so I went all out, using the Angel/Archangel combo that I use to go toe-to-toe with him and beat him. The fun didn't end there, however, as "Mégálopolissienne" shot me a reminder on Facebook the next day, where he wanted to fight me in turn... Anyways, you can check out the full results on Warsheep. The new Total War: THREE KINGDOMS Expansion "Blood and Gold" has been announced and will be available in May 2016, bringing new content and a host of improvements to the award-winning artist's impression of a Dyson sphere about to vaporize the earth. Credit: David Rapley Only a few years ago, astrophysicists thought it could take decades of sustained acceleration to reach $1E26$ joules. In 2016, it was shown that even $1E26$ joules is a very conservative estimate, with the actual flux of power at the beginning of the inflationary epoch as high as $5E25$ joules. Most physicists now believe we will witness the beginning of inflation after the end of the big bang, and if they are right, the universe will enter an era of eternal inflation, where new regions of space are created at an ever-increasing rate. Exotic particles will interact with the vacuum, generating a non-zero vacuum energy. Within about ten years, a particle accelerator in CERN (the European Laboratory for Particle Physics) could generate energy in excess of $1E25$ joules, enough to cause the entire observable universe to shrink to a size of $1E-33$ centimetres. In one scenario this would result in a point of infinite density and no space; in another, it would result in a more stable size, where the universe would have the same size as the observable universe today. In the latter scenario, the energy surplus would continue to grow, resulting in an infinite number of universes. It may appear as if an infinite number of universes, each created from a single point of zero energy density, is an oddity of cosmology, but Sean Carroll has discovered a quite different version of the multiverse: one where each universe has its own version of time. New universes not only add to the number of space-times in which we live, but new versions of time, where the universe
