Chronic inflammatory diseases such as rheumatoid arthritis (RA) present with progressive tissue destruction in the joint. In this disease the synovium becomes infiltrated by a variety of inflammatory cells, including macrophages and neutrophils, which secrete matrix-degrading enzymes such as collagenase, cathepsin G, elastase, and acid proteinases. MMP-1, -2, and -3 are up-regulated in the synovium in RA as well as other inflammatory disease conditions. This proposal addresses the role of macrophages in the synthesis and secretion of MMP-1, -2, and -3 in RA and the effect of high mobility group box 1 (HMGB1) on these cells. HMGB1, a non-histone nuclear protein, is a cytokine that is passively released from nucleated cells during necrosis. We have previously shown that at sites of synovial inflammation or injury, HMGB1 is expressed by macrophages and appears to be critically important in the stimulation of inflammatory cells by bacterial cell wall components. In this study, we have utilized a murine collagenase (MMP-1)-transgenic model of RA to investigate the role of macrophages in HMGB1-induced pro-inflammatory cytokine production, and the effect of HMGB1 on macrophages from arthritic joints. Studies are underway to monitor the state of synovial inflammation and to determine the effects of HMGB1 on pro-inflammatory and matrix degrading enzyme expression and activation of fibroblasts in complications of prematurity, especially respiratory disease and related complications, and of institutional care. This paper discusses a course of parenteral and enteral nutrition, respiratory management, and weaning from respiratory support of preterm infants, based on good general intensive care practice. Any treatment is based on assessment of the severity of illness as judged by the presence of illness or severity and persistence of symptoms. For a patient in respiratory distress, the choice of ventilatory method depends on the pulmonary status and severity of the disease, and on the presence of or the need for associated cardiovascular compromise. The nutritional support and respiratory treatment of such patients can be decided only after the pulmonary condition has been stabilized and the cardiovascular status has been stabilized and investigated.

An increasing percentage of them are surviving, with the attendant problems of
