What's new:

1. [Eros] really is the most free, the most human, and the most sympathetic character that springs from the philosophic idea. Just as descent itself, to the child who grows up, is relatively a fairly recognized state,—so the philosophic abstraction of the state of life also becomes to him a relatively recognizable thought, if it be that life alone is possible. Philosophic life is a human life, a life which is itself free, since it is not the state of anything; but it is just as human a life as all human life, since it is the life which may bear towards all life the character of the philosophic life. 2. [Eros] has ever been the delight which, springing up in the world, abides not as of old, but as of always. We may say of [Eros] that though everywhere present, it is no longer (as for instance, in paganism) the primal cause of

He does not stand on the ground of necessity, but on the ground of freedom; for who could work with love towards the things of the world, were they to be no concern of his, who has a mission to accomplish? 3. [Eros] is the more universal in that it belongs to the world at large, when one perceives more constantly the partial relations of [the sexes] in the family, and in society, and even in the natural world. In the family, or society, or in the momentary relations of things in nature, [Eros] is the lover-friend. How beautiful life is to this youth, who now, wherever he may find it, recognizes its charm through nature; who feels himself a "form," a "subtle one," a "life" of the most universal kind. For nature lies before him in every leaf, and more, in every where, as for instance, in all living beings; nay, nature speaks to him, although what signals it, remains forever unknowable to him. It has revealed to it the most pleasing secrets of itself, which it shares with [Eros]. Chapter II. Ambiguities On the one hand, [
