Mitochondria are intracellular structures that are responsible for oxidative phosphorylation, a vital metabolic process responsible for energy production. The term 'oxidative stress' was first used in 1995, to describe the accumulation of reactive oxygen species (ROS) which in turn causes molecular and structural damage to biological macromolecules. These observations led to the development of an oxidant-antioxidant paradigm; a concept that was later applied to other biochemical pathways. Mitochondria are now seen to be vulnerable to ROS production, and altered production of ROS may be a major contributing factor to many mitochondrial diseases and ageing. A large number of electrons are transferred from the matrix of the mitochondrion to oxygen to generate the proton gradient that ultimately leads to ATP synthesis. Antioxidants, present in the matrix, may participate in the normal process of mitochondrial biogenesis, but they may also be critical for the protection of mitochondria from ROS-induced damage by mediating the repair of ROS-induced oxidative damage to mtDNA. In this article we review the evidence for ROS generation in the mitochondrion and provide some mechanisms for their production. The role of mitochondria in neurodegeneration
