Monsters small and large have inhabited the Earth since the beginning of mankind. Many of us think of the word monster as a physical being with an appearance both frightening and strange, but there are a great number of creatures living on our planet that are considered in most cases to be truly monstrous. And some of these "creeping" beings became so large in size that for now they have become of no significance whatsoever to all but the most dedicated of Sci-Fi aficionados. Spiders The spider family is the largest of all animals on the earth. It can be found on every continent, from every climate, and from every soil and water type. To the alien traveler, arachnids - or at least spiders - can easily seem like some kind of extraterrestrial life-form. They have eight legs, two eyes and a posterior. Some of them even have long and very sensitive feelers, which give them an additional means of hunting prey. Prehistoric Insects Dinosaurs of the Mesozoic Era were a diverse group of Reptiles and Plesiosaurs. Over millions of years, life on the earth gradually took on more terrestrial habits. Then along came the dinosaurs, reptiles covered with armor, and with digits for feet, claws on their hands and a tail. So thick their backs and powerful their tails, these beasts ruled the earth for tens of millions of years. Then nature took an ironic turn, the dinos became extinct due to the impact of an asteroid or meteorite. The earth's climate became a little cooler and the plants and animals that had been preparing for a possible extinction for millions of years managed to adapt and evolve. New Zealand's Giant Wandering Spider When the dinosaurs perished, life on earth changed dramatically. A new era began for mankind. Man's ingenuity grew and flourished. In North America, the first people settled and lived among the ancient fossilized remains of dinosaurs. These men made their dwellings of stone and wooden sticks. They named their new cities after the dead beasts. They worshipped the God-like Tyrannosaurus Rex. No longer hunters, man turned into the hunted. Elsewhere men survived by hunting and gathering. They grew into large communities. The signs of decadence appeared on the faces of these men. They began to build and worship idols. They made gods in their own images, gods who
