Random EXPANSION BOOSTS. Bipolar Disorder Diagnosis The postpartum period, or the period of time following childbirth, is one of the most stressful periods in a woman's life. There is a time for all of us to completely relax, but most women do not experience this luxury. Instead, postpartum stress can be a stressful, sometimes debilitating period. You may feel emotionally or mentally unstable, and there are many difficulties in balancing yourself while dealing with these changes. There is also usually a period of postpartum depression that can occur following childbirth. If you have bipolar disorder, postpartum depression can be one of the worst times of your life. It can appear as a complete lack of interest in anything. Many postpartum women go through this period, and many never return to their normal life post-childbirth. Luckily, with bipolar disorder, this experience is usually just that. Not everyone who has bipolar disorder experiences postpartum depression. But, when you have bipolar disorder and postpartum depression, it's a treacherous and dangerous situation. If you are suffering from either disorder, then you should seek help immediately. If you've had a baby and suffer from bipolar disorder, you may have experienced pregnancy-related hormonal changes. This can make your symptoms worse, making you even more unhappy than before. It is imperative that you take medication during the postpartum period, to ensure you can keep your mood from deteriorating. And, if you have any kind of bipolar disorder, you must also try to avoid getting pregnant again. Pregnancy is a trigger for many people, and it is a trigger for people with bipolar. There's no specific cure for bipolar disorder. That's not to say that there isn't anything that can help. In fact, there is a lot that can be done in the postpartum period to
