Chapter 3: Introduction # Part 3: Systems of Reactive Action What is a computer game? From where does it come? Why do we play this game? And what do we play the game for? This is something many people wonder at when they first start playing a game. I hope the answer to these questions will be clear by now. I also hope these questions will be answered in part 6 of this guide. So, I'll come back to them in 6. And, even though this is mainly about action roleplaying games, it's still a good idea to introduce them in order to understand what part 6 is all about. And since part 3 is dealing with systems of reactive action, it will be a good idea to have a look at that type of system first. # 4: Fighting Is More Than Just Simulating Fighting A fighting game can certainly be a fun way to spend some time, but you can go much deeper than that. You can use the simulation of fighting to actually train in sword fighting. You can use fighting games as an exercise tool in order to have fun, or to develop your own fight styles. You can use fighting games to train in various attacking techniques. You can use fighting games to motivate people and get them to like something. You can use fighting games in order to win... ..of course, you can also lose, and I'm sure there's a fair number of people who play fighting games in order to lose. You can use fighting games to confirm a simple fact: everybody is born

In the context of the above-described field of the invention, "hydrocarbon" means a compound containing carbon and hydrogen atoms, generally in the most reduced state. The term "hydrocarbon mixture" means the mixture of hydrocarbons at all degrees of chemical combination, and comprises the liquid and vapor phases. Crude oil compositions are generally composed of paraffins, naphthenes, aromatics, and other compounds or combinations of these constituents. The paraffins are saturated hydrocarbons, whereas the naphthenes are cyclic alkanes which alternate between carbons and hydrogens. The saturation is reached when two hydrogen atoms in a molecule of paraffin are substituted by a carbon atom. The naphthenes are unsaturated hydrocarbons. Aromatic hydrocarbons, on the other hand, are compounds derived from the benzene or naphthalene ring. Hydrocarbons containing both aromatic and aliphatic groups are termed mixtures of aromatics and paraffins. For example, the following hydrocarbons are mixtures of aromatics and paraffins: toluene, xylene, trimethylbenzene, methylnaphthalene, among others. Paraffin mixtures are obtained by refining crude oil in hydrotreaters. As the refining operation is a drastic step, which may include removing the contaminants, such as sulfur and metals, and the treatment of the oil is elaborate and expensive, it has long been sought to devise simple and economic processes for the conversion of crude oil into valuable, and especially, paraffin free mixtures, of relatively low carbon/hydrogen ratio, which can be easily and economically utilized for other purposes. An example of this type of process is described in U.S. Pat. No. 3,447,918. The processes available for the conversion of crude oil into paraffin mixtures include the following: 1. Partial oxidation of the paraffins to give benzylic radicals followed by a dimerization of the radical to form an alkylated benzene, U.S. Pat. Nos. 2,446,651; 2,440,750; 3,116,942; 3,173,859. 2. A reaction of acid components with hydrocarbons to give paraffins, U.
