(a, b, c, d, e, f, g) A: Did you see the plan? You are using Index Only Scan A: The 'punchline' is: Index Only Scan is only slightly more efficient than Index Scan. In reality it is much, much worse, because it might, depending on the cardinality, perform a sequential scan over the full table to find records that match.

Usually, the Index Only Scan is way, way worse. So it seems the index is not used. If the cardinality is not too large (e.g. small tables, or tables with just one row), you could try a simple heuristic: Remove the words from the query in a separate array, do a simple array union with the array for the index entry, then search in the index. It isn't optimal though.

With a real CPU-bound load of 300 rows / second, this could be done quite fast - but your query is still I/O bound (and I hope, not latency bound) so the benefit will be limited to a few %. So if your table is small enough, an Index Only Scan would be a better option than the slow Index Scan over an unuseful index.
