Behind the master cylinder is a hydraulic accumulator. A pneumatic system may be added to increase safety or to avoid operator fatigue on long trips. The brake pedal can be actuated for a maximum of 6 seconds to make all the brakes function. The brakes have traditionally been wired to the master cylinder, which is a fixed volume element. The brakes can be made from mechanical friction material, but have heavy friction components. Alternatives to the traditional master cylinder, in the form of a pressure intensifying valve, a vehicle brake control valve and single, double or multi-channel accumulators are disclosed in several prior art publications. U.S. Pat. No. 4,358,050 discloses a hydraulic braking system having an actuation site activated by fluid pressure in a control chamber. A pressure intensifier piston is slidably disposed in the control chamber and includes a first projecting portion that acts to block flow of pressure fluid from the chamber to the brake pedal when the control chamber is a low pressure condition, and a second projecting portion that causes the piston to move in response to a defined partial increase of control pressure in the control chamber to reduce the width of a hydraulic fluid pressure brake path formed between an atmosphere and the control chamber to thereby reduce the amount of time for which the brake is energized. U.S. Pat. No. 5,875,314 discloses a brake system including a pressure intensifier actu
