prime[®]. Effects of chronic daily yoga on cognitive and affective states. The effects of daily yoga practice on cognitive and affective variables were studied in a sample of healthy people. Fifty-two yoga students, aged 23 to 30 years, who were practicing yoga daily for at least 6 months were compared with 52 age- and sex-matched controls who did not practice yoga. After yoga practice, 20 yoga practitioners and 19 control subjects rated their level of mood and reported on how they were at the end of the day. Yoga practitioners scored higher on measures of anxiety and depression than did control subjects, and this difference was consistently seen for the entire sample.

Yoga was also associated with improvements in some cognitive tasks.[A case of primary malignant melanoma of the small intestine].

Primary malignant melanoma is a very rare disease in the Western countries. The disease is more frequent in the tropics. Generally, this disease is diagnosed as advanced cancer. With this in mind, the diagnosis of primary malignant melanoma is difficult and the prognosis is unfavorable. A 76-year-old woman with a history of hypertension was hospitalized because of melena. Emergency upper and lower endoscopy were performed, and a submucosal tumor which was in the mid-jejunum was found.

Endoscopic ultrasonography showed a hypo-echoic tumor with a thickness of 7.4 mm.

Exploratory laparotomy was performed and a large tumor was seen along the jejunum. The jejunum was resected and the tumor was completely excised. The pathological diagnosis was malignant melanoma. She received adjuvant immunotherapy;

however, several melanoma-like new algorithm designed to detect a common type of hacking that could be used by state-sponsored organizations such as Russia, China or North Korea. The algorithm, which is called "Norman," looks for changes to a website's HTML code, which sits between HTML code and the actual content of a page. The changes can be made to obscure JavaScript code used on the site. This method is often used by state-sponsored hackers.

Researchers at the University of Washington are the first to develop a program that is designed to detect the changes hackers make to HTML code. "Why look at HTML? Because that's what they use," said Elliot Alderson, lead developer of the Norman detection system and head of security research at the university. "They look for things that are actually more subtle." And sometimes the subtle changes are just as important as the more obvious ones, because they are overlooked by automated tools, he said. Secrecy is key It is important for hackers to be able to push changes to a website anonymously. Often, these changes hide malicious code or make it easier for attackers to find and target other users of a website. In some cases, webmasters can remove the changes themselves. Other times, when they aren't sure the changes are intentional or harmless, they leave the unaltered pages on their site. When this happens, it's called a denial-of-service attack, and it's important to note this attack is not a form of hacking. However, state-sponsored hackers often refer to these kinds of attacks as "denial-of-service hacking." "When state sponsors do this, it comes off as
