A hydromagnetic machine, such as a magnetic bearing, generally includes a machine frame which supports a stator assembly and a rotor assembly positioned in close proximity to the stator assembly. The machine frame and stator assembly are coaxially positioned on a suitable structure such as a high-strength steel plate, and this base plate and stator assembly are mounted to form a rotor assembly suitable for attachment to a rotating shaft. Hydromagnetic machines generally include a magnetic bearing, such as a hydromagnetic bearing or an electromagnetic bearing, which provides a bearing on which the rotor assembly may be supported during rotation. Bearings usually comprise a stator fixed relative to the machine frame and a rotor fixed relative to the machine frame and rotor assembly. The rotor may be supported on the stator in various ways, such as by magnetic attraction, sliding or sliding friction or by any suitable combination of the above methods. One of the types of bearings in common use is a magnetic bearing, in which a magnetic force produced in the stator magnetically holds or attracts the rotor in close proximity to the stator. The stator includes a stator laminate which surrounds the rotor and the stator laminates and
