The UK government are warning UK travellers of a surge in the risk of terrorism amid fears that the military operation in Syria is distracting some jihadis from attacks at home. The threat level for international terrorism in Britain has been raised to 'severe', meaning that a terrorist attack is "highly likely". A memo issued by the Department for Transport and made public by the BBC today said that while the level is not being raised to 'critical' - which means an attack is likely - its purpose is to "remind people that the risk of a terrorist attack in the UK is at an all-time high". Home Secretary

Amber Rudd said: "We are constantly reviewing the threat level to take account of the changing terrorist environment. "Our national counter-terrorism strategy will continue to be updated regularly to support the police and other law enforcement agencies in their work to keep the public safe." The rise in the threat level was announced amid speculation that the military campaign, launched by UK Prime Minister David Cameron in April, has not deterred terrorists planning to attack the UK. An estimated 140 British fighters are taking part in the battle in Iraq and Syria, and since the UK joined the intervention there have been three attacks on coalition forces. In one, 16 people were killed in a bombing at an army base in the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk. In another, a wave of car bombs in Iraq that killed more than 100 people, was claimed by Isis and came after the group carried out a string of atrocities, including the beheading of UK aid worker David
