The present invention relates to a centrifugal blower having a cyclone chamber, which is located, on one side thereof, at the side of the blower which is connected to the pressure tank, and which is cooled by a blower fan, especially an axial fan. In the housing of the centrifugal blower is located the cyclone chamber having a separating wall which is arranged at the end of the cyclone chamber. A flange part is attached on the end of the separating wall. The separating wall is formed of a section of a housing part. The separating wall rests against the interior wall of the housing part by means of radial struts. As a rule, a centrifugal blower has a cyclone chamber for separating a medium, such as sludge and dirt, from the sucked in medium to form a secondary flow. Such a cyclone chamber having a separating wall is subjected to rather high pressure changes in the primary flow. The separating wall is supported, on the one hand by a chamber base and, on the other hand, by radial struts. For this purpose, the separating wall is arranged in a housing of the centrifugal blower, which is usually made from a synthetic material or from a composite material. The separating wall is held in an axial direction by the chamber base and by the radial struts. The separating wall in the chamber base is supported against the end face of the separating wall by means of bearing strips. The separating wall rests on the end face by means of the bearing strips. This ensures that the separating wall is not pressed onto the end face of the separating wall and is not damaged by the pressure fluctuations in the primary flow. As a rule, an axial fan is used as the blower fan. The axial fan has the advantage of a rather simple and cost-effective construction. For this purpose, the blower fan is usually arranged on the end face of the separating wall. It is the object of the present invention to design a flange for a separating wall which is connected to the chamber base such that a stress level in the separating wall is reduced. In a centrifugal blower, this object is achieved by means of a flange for a separating wall which is connected to the chamber base and which has an inwardly pointing radial flange surface for supporting a separating wall. The separating wall is formed of
