changes after acute alcohol intoxication and recovery. The effects of acute alcohol intoxication and recovery on the senses of taste, smell and touch were examined in nine subjects. A 400 ml dose of 95% ethanol was administered orally to five subjects, and intravenously to four subjects, 3 and 6 h before testing. Testing included identification of color changes, detection of taste and recognition of shape for both taste and smell. Tactile detection thresholds were obtained by application of well-defined stimuli. Alcohol intoxication did not affect the sense of taste for any subject. In the group ingesting ethanol orally, correctly identified shapes ranged from 0.53 (0.56) with a high speed of presentation to 0.46 (0.58) with a slow speed of presentation. After recovering from the effects of alcohol, the same subjects showed improved recognition of shapes with a slow speed of presentation. When correctly identified shapes were used to determine the detection threshold for an electric shock delivered to the tongue, ethanol had no effect on either taste or touch. It is concluded that acute alcohol intoxication does not affect either the sense of smell or taste, but is associated with a loss of tactile detection threshold in the finger to a mechanical stimulus. It is suggested that the tactile loss is a result of alcohol consumption; other factors may also contribute.

You can learn EVERYTHING in Blender from the ground up. Nothing else has it's options quite the way 3DS Max does. c6a93da74d
