The custom build directory can be specified by the --build-diroption. By default this option is not used. If the --build-dir option is provided, the framework copies all downloaded artifacts to the directory specified by this option. This is useful if you use a custom directory structure and if you want to add a downloaded artifact to the build but do not want to overwrite files in a build. You can use the --build-dir option without specifying any files to download if you only want to add downloaded artifacts to the build. $ git lfs pull -c gitLFS Enter your git-ssh-url password: # push a branch (optional, defaults to branch on repo)

By default the cache is stored on the directory under global.autoupg_log_dir. You can set other options on the following global cfg.enableGlobalCache should be set to true if you want to use a global cache. This attributes is true if the package has been downloaded from Artifactory, which means it is the latest released version of the package. It is also a built-in attribute of the dependency. For more information about the dependency, please refer to the Autoupgrade Fetching section A global configuration file gets downloaded and saved to local file. It is the only configuration file and can be used to override the built-in config files, see build-config and the check-config tools for example. We are also providing a directory argument to the go/mod-download CLI command as well as a mandatory argument (using the jfrog-go command). The directory argument is where we would store the downloaded files. It can be useful for working with files on other devices (like a home cloud instance) for working with a release. If the above command is successful (and the files in the global.artifacts directory are all zip files), then it moves them to the default directory set by the global.download_dir property of the JFrog CLI config. So if we want to download, modify, and upload artifacts to a number of JFrog Build Pipeline repositories then we could run the following command multiple times for each repositerpote: jfrog-go get --transitive --download --ignore-dir="global.artifacts" --check --directory="global.artifacts" --mandatory --prefix="$(artifactory-template-url)/production/LATEST" --certificate-file=" $(jfrog-hub-url)/service/rest/server/certs/client-cert.pem" --key-file="$(jfrog-hub-url)/ service/rest/server/certs/client-key.pem" --certificate-path="$(jfrog-hub-url)/service/rest/server/pki/client-cert. 5ec8ef588b
