a few long shots that appear together on the movie screen. I decided to shoot a range of exposures for each scene, ranging from 4 seconds to 4 minutes, both at ISO 80 and ISO 6400 (for comparisons and to make sure the shots aren't underexposed). On the vast majority of the images I didn't want the exposure to extend beyond 4 seconds (yet sometimes I did), but I did decide on the spot whether or not to include the longer exposures. Some of the images were over 100% larger than the others, and now I wish they were smaller. I really liked the images made with the ISO 80 setting, but the images made with ISO 6400 have a sharper look and feel to them. As I mentioned, the absence of motion blur gives these images an extra touch of clarity. Video I shot the video with the Canon 5D mark iii, with an 18mm pancake lens that has a maximum aperture of 2.8. I tried to stay in the sweet spot. There's one scene, at least at the beginning of the video, that is really grainy. I really like that look — think of this as a sort of grungy, low-fi old-school video. The rest of the video is great. The exposure time varies from 1 second to 4 minutes 30 seconds. You can play the video in the browser here. Final Thoughts One thing I learned from this shoot is that you can get away with shooting certain types of scenes at slower shutter speeds. I think that's because the types of things that happen on the street are slow to start and remain relatively static for most of the video. As a result, they don't require a fast shutter speed. It's also really important to have the right sensor. The Canon 5D mark iii is the perfect tool for shooting movies, with a fast maximum aperture of 2.8, a resolution of 26mp, and a sensitivity range of ISO 80 to 12,800. Shooting at higher ISO settings is no longer a hassle — although I did find a limit of about ISO 12,800 as far as subject motion. I am very happy with my last two videos — both in terms of the quality of the images and the sound. For only about $200 you can buy a really nice camera for shooting video. [UPDATE:] I decided to try to make a
