While the Adobe flagship tool can do the most things most people want, you can take it further and have a bit more control over your workflow. This means trimming, burning, or cropping before you import to Photoshop, straight from the browser, removing unwanted items in Photoshop, or even faster version control tools for images you may never need at full resolution. With all the great changes Adobe has brought to Photoshop for the web, the general workflow has been simplified to work with controlled layouts and to stay in focus. It seems easier to create the perfect design that fits in a web browser, rather than write code and tweak the layout. The capabilities in Photoshop for the web are in a beta stage now, but the possibilities are still exciting. Adobe's Creative Cloud and Creative Suite beautifully complement the web and in your profiles, so the workflow is even more ready for the web. Although the Adobe Creative Cloud Photography service has been available for a while, the beta features are coming out this year. It's easier than ever to capture, edit, and share your photo collections with the Creative Cloud. For designers and developers, the new features will allow the workflow to take on even more complexity, with a new interface for even more control. Whether you need to edit image layers, or even create and save your own version of Photoshop for the web, you'll be able to have it all. Following up on our announcement earlier this year, the beta features in the new Adobe Photoshop have finally been released. Adobe is changing the world of how we work and are bringing the power of Photoshop to the web in a bigger and better way.
