If the software is cracked, it is possible to use it in a commercial situation. However, the developer of the software may still have the right to sue you for any losses that occur as a result of using the cracked software. If this happens, the court will return your product, and you may be financially responsible for any losses that occurred as a result of using the cracked software. The most common thing to happen if you use a cracked software is that you may not be able to register the product. This means that the software will not be able to identify that you are using a cracked version of the software. If you ever forget to register the product, you may get caught using a cracked product, and you could be subject to fines or even jail time.

Humans have been taking photos for as long as technology has existed, but the major evolution of photography's scale occurred in the early 20th century when the first communication depended on it. Thanks to the Internet, we now have access to our own personal photo library, accessible from practically any device, and at any time. Having the option to choose which film stock to use for your photos is great. Being able to create a 16:9 or a 4:3 crop from a 4:3 photo is awesome. Being able to give a custom camera setting is insane. In the P&S detail view, for example, at the bottom of the render controls, up on the left side of the control window, is a dialog that lets you adjust the built-in lighting set up for that image. Now I just have to figure out how to take those custom settings with me when I travel and handle the pictures on other computers. Having to be in the Creative Cloud with Photoshop to see these new intriguing options is not a good compromise for the user of Photoshop. These things are easy to miss if someone is not paying attention. I'm sure the Adobe designers can see these things as they work every day, like the rest of us, but the consumer would never get a chance to see them on their day to day usage. Adobe really needs to simplify the whole thing. Create, edit, save images. It's a far too complicated. It is very common for my to create a document in Aperture, and upload the file to a web hosting service. I then can receive the URL to the document at that point and work on it in Photoshop. I then can upload a new version of the document and it automatically gets sent to the service. And if I need to collaborate with someone, we can upload the URL to each other, and we can work in new versions of the file, and it's all in the cloud. The only problem I can see in this is that some services do not allow the file to be updated while it is being offered for viewing and may not want to have a temporary document open in a browser window.
