push toward better resource allocation, which was long overdue.
But he also began assembling the last of the new rules that brought environmentalism into conservation's DNA. The most important of those rules was the 1978 Endangered Species Act, which would require the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to list as threatened or endangered species "any species that the Service determines is likely to become endangered within the foreseeable future." The law had strong bipartisan support in Congress, but as King admitted in a 1977 speech to the National Wildlife Federation, "There were not enough of us to push it through." The final act came in 1973, when Congress ratified the U.N.'s Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD), an international agreement to protect plants and animals. But even under the CBD's new covenant, the United States has a dismal record of protecting a long list of species that many conservation biologists believe deserve the protection they won through the Endangered Species Act. A review of that record was conducted by the U.N.'s Environment Programme, and the results were grim. Only 14 percent of all U.S. terrestrial mammals and birds were protected under the CBD at the time the study was conducted, and only a tiny percentage of those were listed in federal law. The review concluded, "The United States has, to the consternation of many, not been able to live up to its obligations under the CBD." Something needed to change. Recognizing that the country needed a major shift in its conservation paradigm, King suggested that the United States adopt the global perspective that was emerging from the CBD and one that had become known as "biodiversity." He also realized the need to bring the new tools of the environmental movement into the conservation world.
