Cracking Adobe Photoshop is more difficult and more time consuming than installing it. You'll first need to download a program called a keygen. This will allow you to generate a valid serial number for your software. You can do this by downloading a keygen from a trusted source. After the keygen is downloaded, run it and generate a valid serial number. Enter the serial number into the software and then click "Activate." You should now have a fully functional version of the software. It's just like installing, but you have to crack the software first.

ABOVE: A Monet created in Adobe Photoshop Elements 20. BELOW: A view of the previous version of Photoshop Elements for Android. (I'm a pretty old guy; it was the biggest number in my address book!) Technology has many parts, and part of the excitement of my job is finding out how it'll play out in the consumer realm. I didn't realize how many people would be interested in what I create until I started down this path, and now many of them see what happens when I'm publishing on TV or reviewing and commenting on a movie. I upgraded to Lightroom 5.2 and noticed a delay when editing images, especially when using the various non-sharpening resizing filters. This was not there with Lightroom 4.3.* So I suspect LR5.2 has changed something significant internally.

I also experienced the issue mentioned here before: "We have also fixed a bug introduced in LR4 that can occur when importing some RAW files that are usually imported without problems. For some users, the 'Reload button' in the Import panel will not appear and will never be able to be used to reload the current import."

I have noticed that this happens with .jpg imports only, not with imports from .dng or .raw. It happens even after plenty of imports in different folders. I believe the bug is that the overall settings for imported images instead of per-import settings, as in LR4.3. I have also noticed that there are no settings in LR5.2 that make an import efficient. If you use the auto save before applying (which I do), you are nearly guaranteed to trigger this problem. I always have to work extra hard to be sure not to fight this bug. Also, the only way I can get around it is first to open the preferences and switch the "Normally Import" to "Click Only". This fixes the problem and gives me a working reload button afterward, but I wish this problem could be fixed without having to switch settings.
